Industrial Education. The extent to which a state shall educate its citizens is a subject discussed in all parts of the civilized world, and its decision involves important national consequences. The result of the world's debate seems to have been the crystalization of one opinion, at least, generally conceded to be sound, viz: If it is just that a state should carry public education beyond the amount which necessity requires in its citizens for the perpetuation of its existence, then no limit can be fixed to the extent to which a state may rightly attempt, by education, to make its citizens wiser, better, and happier; if more than the rudiments be taught, the national university follows logically, velopment of the course inexpedient. Now the one great objection to public instruction in the higher branches of knowledge is that it un-TERMS CASH. Free Art Gallery. fits the student for any but pure headwork and makes him dissatisfied in any field of labor outside of the so-called learned professions. The vast majority of young men, whose lives are destined to be spent in the noble work of developing the nation's material resources, thus come from their course of mental training unskilled and prejudiced in respect to their lifework. Industrial education aims to obviate this objection by preparing young men for mechanical industries just as they are now prepared for law, medicine and theology. It teaches the art which is applied to practice in all specific industries, and serves as a foundation for their successful pursuit. It develops the powers of that wonderful in-Strument the human hand, along with those of the mind, and raises human manual labor above the exertion of mer brute force. In the professions which require a trained hand, skill has been obtained in the past by the apprenticeship system, in which the pupil, commencing far from the elements, learns only by bungling. By the proposed plan the analytical method of instruction is to be applied, and those manipulations of the hands and the use of those tools are to be taught, which in a general way run through all mechanical pursuits. Industrial education is not merely theoretical, but is practically exemplified in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, whose president in a recent lecture in this city exhibited some remarkable specimens of his pupils' skill; and this Institute is itself an imitation of the Imperial Technical School at Moseow, Russia. The introduction of the hardly fail to have beneficial results. The objection that all men cannot be mechanics is as strong as the similar one to a liberal education, that all men are not to follow the learned professions. No one uses every particle of knowledge that he possesses; it is the power to draw from this stock whatever the emergency requires that alone is valuable. Industrial eduwhile bringing it more completely under the control of the mind; it will aid in developing our country's most important resources, by sending forth for this purpose a body of trained youth, enthusiastic in their work; it will prepare the large majority of young men for their life labors; and as for the remainder, without detriment to their peculiar studies, it will give them a new power to meet and solve the problems of life and to overcome its difficulties, by placing under their control the hand, an organ too wonderful in its manifold adaptations to hang uselessly by the side, or to be employed mainly in the office of earrying food to the The "Paulist Fathers" in New York have taken a needed stand in endeavoring to repress the extravagance and folly of costly funerals in general, and especially among people who, with justice to the living, are unable to stand the expense of these displays. One of their preachers contrasts the pomp observed in the last rites in honor of an obscure person with the simple burial of Christ Himself, and denounces the practice of arraying a corpse in garments which vie in extravagance and fashion with those of the theatre and ball room. And he justly says that "to make a dead body an object about which to display earthly vanity and pride is to defile that which is holy and outrage that which is decent." Jefferson's style is so simple, easy, and natural, so utterly devoid of strut or rant, that to the mind of some who cannot see the art that conceals art, he "does not act at all." In the most impassioned scene in his "Rip," that where he is driven from home by his termagant wife, the irresistable pathos of the situation that brings tears to every eye, is brought about by the simplest touches-a slight quaver in the voice, a single gesture of reproachful appeal to his wife, a half-suppressed sob of grief, as the poor vagabond says farewell to his little girl and hurries forth into the stormy
